

mat. [...] We protested at football games, and at the administration, etc. Our demands were at that point--it basically was drop the Nike contract, that thing. It was not quite clear to us at the time what the right thing would be.

appears to have been common among students in addition to being unsure of their exact demands, of plan for pressuring the administrators of the street theater on campus to raise awareness, not necessarily have a clear idea about how to long-term plan for changing college policy. Later, over the summer of 2005, a national student group, Students Against Sweatshops (USAS), convened only from other US anti-sweatshop groups, brought the globe. Their goal was to come up with a plan to get companies to change their business practices, to source their manufacturing something that would be a change in the industry. The product of this was a Program (DSP), in which companies doing business would be required to source a certain percentage of their goods by 25%, but eventually 75%--to particular factories.
